Hey man.
We are in the Champions League, man!
Dilly-ding, dilly-dong, come on!
You forget, you speak about blah, blah blah
but we are in the Champions League, man!
It's fantastic.
It's terrific.
Well done
to everybody.

Big money makes big teams and usually big teams win.
Now we can say
only 99% of the time.

Half Life: a Hana Walker mystery

A missing girl. A natural disaster. A teenager who won't give up. Hana Walker is a 19-year-old waitress who is struggling to put the pieces of her life back together after the deaths of her English father and Japanese mother. But when she decides to help a jilted American father find Emi, his beloved daughter abducted to Japan, Hana discovers that taking matters into her own hands leaves her on the wrong side of the law – and the yakuza. Now she faces her severest danger, as the country is devastated by earthquake, tsunami and nuclear meltdown. Time is running out. Is her tenacity, smartphone prowess and love of natto enough to find a lost girl in a nation reeling from disaster? Can Hana stay out of the hands of the police long enough to find her before the yakuza do?

I am not a Foreigner: a short story

A throwaway comment about foreigners opens a psychological battleground between a newlywed English husband and his Japanese mother-in-law. He probably should have known better since she is a detective for one of Shinjuku's leading private investigation bureaus.
